

The Why:

Educators have a responsibility to diversify the representation in the texts that students read in their classrooms. There is a world of diverse texts available that will give a broader viewpoint of the world as well as allow for and celebrate greater representation. Each of the books in the chart below feature protagonists and characters that are a part of underrepresented groups. There are also non-fiction texts that represent diverse voices and diverse perspectives of history.

These texts invite the work that needs to be done to promote anti-bias and anti-racism (ABAR) in the classroom. It is not enough to just teach a diverse curriculum - this work should also include opportunities for deep discussions, self-realizations, research, attitude shifting, bias recognition, and identity discovery. Educators should move beyond this chart, and explore the other resources provided, to help them develop a more diverse curriculum.

The How:

The chart has been designed to help an educator explore diverse texts that can supplement or replace traditional texts. On the chart, there are common themes and texts taught in the secondary English Language Arts classroom. For each common theme or traditional text, there are diverse texts with similar themes. The diverse population represented in the book is also listed. In the Book Info column, the link provided leads to a summary of the book (in the case of the two short stories and one essay, the link leads to a copy of the text). The abbreviations for Genre and Grade Level are as follows:

Genre		Grade Level
Fiction (F)	Drama (D)	Middle School (MS)
Non-Fiction (NF)	Poetry (P)	High School (HS)

It is important to remember that this list is by no means exhaustive. This list of diverse texts is a good place to start, as well as exploring the resources that have been provided after the chart. Start slow – for example, pick one text to replace or supplement in one unit of the current curriculum. This is important work that will take time, and the best part is that there are resources to assist with expanding the current curriculum and move it toward inclusivity and intersectionality.
