Feedback [noun]

feed · back /'fēd,bak/

a screeching or humming sound resulting from the return of a fraction of the output signal from an amplifier, microphone, or other device to the input of the same device.

The word feedback began its rise in popularity in the 1950s with the dawning of the audio industry. How many of us have cringed when someone got too close to the speakers with the microphone they were using?

Fortunately, the definition has moved on since the olden days.

AZCSP values feedback regarding everything we do. We take the feedback and discuss how it can be used to increase the effectiveness and efficiency in the trainings we provide. It is valuable in so many ways.

Please continue to provide us with your ideas, suggestions, kudos, and challenges regarding any of the technical assistance AZCSP provides. Just try not to screech.

I personally think you are doing a phenomenal job. To be able to "be" in classrooms despite not being able to be in classrooms is amazing. I appreciate that we can still see teachers and that this entire process didn't have to get shut down or pushed back. I also frequently take what I learn and implement with my facilitation as well as with my thinking.
