Social-emotional wellness is important for every person, particularly our students with disabilities who, according to recent research, are more likely to experience isolation from their peers and have higher rates of mental health concerns in adulthood. The significance of social-emotional learning for transition-aged youths is receiving increased attention in schools. Join us as we hear from experts in the field on how the transition planning process can be enhanced by incorporating social-emotional learning to improve student postsecondary outcomes. More details to come this Spring.
